American Psychological Association Annual Conference
July 31 – August 4, 2013
By Lauren Duncan

The funding from the Sherrerd Center allowed me to participate in a teaching roundtable at the American Psychological Association annual conference. In this roundtable, we brainstormed about ways in which to integrate current feminist psychological research into courses across the curriculum. Although this research is most often included in Psychology of Women and Gender courses, it is also important to integrate it into mainstream Introduction to Psychology, Research Methods, Social Psychology, and other courses. We were able to develop a multi-page resource sheet outlining exercises, videos, websites, and readings that accomplish this goal. This resource will be made widely available to psychologists online.
