- What is accessibility? There is an accessibility code and spaces are either compliant or non compliant.
  - This code is called ADAG and is available to students (and the general public) online.
- Spaces must meet the code completely. A space is not accessible if something is a little off.
- According to this definition, all academic buildings on campus are accessible, though many residential buildings are not.
- Roger has talked to Laura Roucher about how students can become involved in making the campus more accessible. They both agreed that it would help if students reported problems
- There is currently no accessibility audit planned because Facilities is aware of where the accessibility issues are and would like to channel energy and money to fixing those problems.
- Changes will be made within the context of a larger renovation
- If accessible bathrooms do not have locks students should report this via the school’s work order system.
  - The form will ask for your room number but you can still report an issue anywhere on campus
  - You can also call facilities directly or email facilitiesservices@smith.edu
○ An mobile app is in the works. It would be useful to add a list of accessible spaces on this app.

● In regards to gender neutral bathrooms which are labeled as accessible, Roger would like to consult Dwight Hamilton before taking any action.

● Smith has determined the amount that it would like to put into the capital plan for every year. Currently it is about 20 million. Accessibility is part of this plan.

● Most major renovations can only happen during the summer.

● There is a plan in the works to move laundry facilities from inaccessible basements

● Paradise Apartments will be 50% accessible and Accessibility Vans will be running to that part of campus.

● It is best to avoid elevators because they require a lot of upkeep and money to maintain
